7.1.8. Describe the Institutional efforts/initiatives in providing an inclusive environment i.e., tolerance and harmony towards cultural, regional, linguistic, communal socioeconomic and other diversities.

Sustainable Development and sustainability have played an increasingly important role in engineering education over the last 20 years but more needs to be done. The infrastructure – inequality – resilience nexus is in many respects an integration issue. More integrated approaches to infrastructure and resilience that respects social aspects can be accelerated by actively supporting integration of sustainability into tertiary-level education. It is widely expected that engineering graduates should have:

- An ability to analyze social and environmental aspects of engineering activities. Such ability includes an understanding of the interactions that engineering has with the economic, social, health, safety, legal, and cultural aspects of society, the uncertainties in the prediction of such interaction.
- Demonstrate critical awareness of the sustainability and impact of engineering activity on the social, industrial and physical environment.
- Understand and evaluate the sustainability and impact of professional engineering work in the solution of complex engineering problems in societal and environmental contexts.

Clearly there is a great deal already going on in engineering education around the world, but it would benefit by being more broadly integrated into tertiary-level education. Engineering graduates would benefit by gaining a more holistic understanding of sustainable development and the role that engineering can play in meeting important social and economic goals.

Actions for Consideration

- Encourage the engineering aspirants to define needed changes in engineering education for sustainable development;
- To spearhead the engineering aspirants on the exact path towards the sustainable development.
- Use existing technical resources to support and encourage sharing of resources on teaching and learning about sustainable development and for the development of both the faculty and the student community.
